

Most people have a general understanding of why active oil drilling near residential neighborhoods is a problem. Oil extraction increases the amount of methane in the air. It's linked to higher asthma rates in children as well as higher rates of preterm labor in pregnant women who live near active drilling sites. But what most people don't see are the quieter, more insidious practices oil companies use to keep these wells running, and how far they're willing to go to extract more oil, even when those wells sit next to homes, schools, and parks. Let's talk about one of them: acid maintenance.

This is a process that involves injecting industrial-grade acid into oil wells to break up blockages and extend the life of old equipment. It's common in aging urban fields, where production is slowing down but operators are trying to squeeze out every remaining drop. The chemicals used are so hazardous that workers wear hazmat suits and regularly monitor for exposure. The problem is that the people living nearby often don't even know it's happening.

Before the courts struck down the City's oil ordinance last year, acid maintenance projects had to go through public review and community notification. That system worked. There were no acid maintenance operations while those protections were in place. But after the ruling, operators ramped up activity. In just six months, there have been more than 30 notices of acid maintenance citywide, and not all of them followed even the basic rules that still apply.

That's why I co-authored a motion with Councilmember Tim McOsker last year to pause acid maintenance and restore public oversight. My office is also pushing the City's Chief Zoning Administrator to issue a revised interpretation of the zoning code that would bring back transparency and review of acid maintenance practices. With the passage of AB 3233, the City now has clear authority to regulate this work. We need to use it.

This is not just a public health issue. It's about who gets protected and who doesn't. It's about whether Los Angeles is willing to stand up to an industry that has taken too much for too long at our expense. On Tuesday, the Energy and Environment Committee will consider the City Attorney's report on my motion. If you are able, I encourage you to participate and show your support. You can do so by submitting written public comment in support of CF 24-1580 or by attending the meeting in person.

All my best,

Katy

City Budget Updates

This week, the Budget Committee continued reviewing the Mayor's proposed budget through a series of departmental hearings. These hearings give us a clearer picture of how the proposal would impact operations, staffing, and service delivery across the City. After our final departmental hearing tomorrow, departments will work with the City Administrative Officer to prepare over 300 memos responding to questions raised during the hearings.

One item I pushed for this week was restoring $5 million to the Animal Services Department's operating budget. That money had been moved into the Unappropriated Balance in the Mayor's proposal, which led to understandable concern about possible shelter closures. By moving the funds directly into the department's budget now, we avoid disruption and give the department the stability it needs to keep serving animals and the people who care for them.

Second, we are advancing the creation of a new Bureau of Homelessness Oversight within the Housing Department, a proposal I supported alongside Councilmembers Raman and Blumenfield. This new Bureau brings coordination and accountability to a system that's currently too fragmented across different city departments. We also asked for a memo that would restore many of the eliminated positions in the Planning Department, and identify ways to speed development services through consolidation and streamlining.

Next week, after the memos are complete, we'll begin recommending changes to the Mayor's proposal. Some will focus on savings. Others will move funding and staffing where they can be more effective. And some will restore programs and positions that generate revenue, reduce liabilities, and improve the service delivery of core city services. I will provide a more complete overview of the changes we are able to make next week, but for now, you can follow along by viewing the full schedule of the hearings here, and watching the live streams here.

Standing with Survivors on Denim Day

This week, I joined my colleagues in recognizing Denim Day, an international day of action led by Peace Over Violence to support survivors of sexual violence and push for a culture of consent and accountability.

In the past year, the Council has taken important steps to support survivors of gender-based violence. We secured the largest increase in funding for survivor services in the city's history, required training for homeless service providers, and created a task force to strengthen enforcement of Domestic Violence Restraining Orders. These are meaningful changes, but they only matter if we stay committed to the work. Denim Day is a reminder that showing up must happen all year.
